Selected Poems 2009-03-26 the arguments concerning versification and genre that are presented in this book will be based on evidence that is specific with respect to language culture and historical period the language is castilian the culture and period those of the spanish empire with major centers in madrid barcelona naples seville mexico city lima during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and the genres chosen are associated with the renaissance classical tradition the sonnet the verse epistle the silva none of these genres existed prehistorically that is before the invention of writing they are all literally literary the sonnet is one of the best examples in modern western poetry of a genre but welles and warren might question whether it could even be called a genre that is defined wholly by the material shape of its signifier the verse epistle on the other hand depends on the pre existence of letter writing and letter reading as a social institution and the problematic silva as we shall see may be seen either as a relatively irregular metric pattern or as a vaguely defined classical or baroque kind of poetry this limited sample of historical genres will perhaps permit a few tentative generalizations about poetry it will also i hope serve as a useful introduction for the reader of english who wants to know something about the kinds of poetic discourse that existed in spain s golden age and about how they functioned and developed from the preface
