Secondary 2022 1965 surface temperatures were calculated for bodies in steady supersonic flight at mach numbers from 2 to 10 and for altitudes from 50 000 and 200 000 feet and emissivities from 0 to 1 the importance of the effects of radiation and convection was determined it was found under the assumption of an isothermal atmosphere that the gain of heat from the air by convection decreases at constant mach number as the altitude is increased equilibrium between convection and radiation is established at temperatures that that consequently decrease as altitude is increased in general therefore at sufficiently high altitudes the surface temperature is considerably less than the stagnation temperature at a mach number of 8 for example the stagnation temperature is 4800 degrees f absolute and the equilibrium surface temperature for an emissivity of 0.5 is 3800 degrees f absolute at 50 000 feet and decreases to 1350 degrees f at 200 000 feet
